

🎯 What does it actually look like to give something its own space?

Last time, we talked about the moment you start to recognize it — when a reply stops feeling like “just a reply” and starts acting more like work.

This time, let’s make that shift concrete.

Because in practice, it’s usually much smaller than people expect.

It often starts with a sentence like this:

“Hey... this might be worth moving into a channel so we can keep track of it.”

That’s it.

No announcement.

No formality.

Just a gentle nudge.

From there, the move itself is simple:

- Create a channel (or choose one that already fits)
 - Drop in a quick post to frame the topic
 - Bring the conversation with you — summarize or copy what matters
 - Let the replies continue there
-

That small shift does a few quiet things:

- It gives the work a home
 - It keeps the conversation from getting buried
 - It makes it possible for someone else to join later — and still follow along
-

And maybe most importantly:

It lets the original thread go back to being what it was meant to be — lightweight, conversational, in the flow... back where it belongs — right down the line.

You don't have to get it perfect.
You don't have to move everything.

You just have to notice the moment —
and act on it while it's still small.

Last time, we talked about recognizing when something needs its own space.
Next time, we'll look at how channels start to take shape once the work is there — and what “working well” actually looks like in practice.

#AllSuttonedUp · 36